Dear Chair, Excellencies, colleagues from UNHCR and NGOs:

It is an honour for us to brief this Committee on UNHCR's 2026 Global Consultations with NGOs, which took place online from 28 to 30 September.

For more than three decades, consultations between UNHCR and NGOs have provided a forum for them to come together to discuss global issues and explore collaboration. NGOs are grateful to UNHCR for its ongoing commitment, despite the recent challenges it has faced.

Strategic collaboration with NGOs is essential to UNHCR's protection and operational response. NGOs provide operational reach, contextual and technical expertise, and close links with displaced and host communities. This collaboration must go beyond operational coordination to achieve meaningful dialogue, joint analysis and collective advocacy, ensuring that operational realities influence priorities, policies and decision-making.

UNHCR's Global Consultations with NGOs are vital for achieving real progress on protection, particularly at a time when organisations protecting refugees and stateless persons are under extreme pressure, and in many contexts where the space in which they operate is shrinking. Preserving that space – and these consultations – is a prerequisite for protection itself.

This year's Global Consultations were entitled Safeguarding Asylum and Strengthening Protection. We met as the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees marks its anniversary and the 1961 Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness marks its .

The level of interest in participating from NGOs, in all their diversity, was extraordinary. More than 1,000 people from 663 civil society organisations across 109 countries and territories registered. More than two-thirds represented national, local and community-based organisations, including those led by refugees, women, young people and stateless persons. They were joined by organisations representing people with disabilities, the LGBTIQ+ community and indigenous peoples, as well as international NGOs, networks and academic institutions.

To accommodate and draw on this diversity of expertise, the Consultations were conducted in four languages, thanks to the generous support of volunteers, and were adapted to different time zones. Guided by a participatory Steering Group, UNHCR and the NGOs jointly planned the process and collaboratively drafted recommendations. This was based on specific written contributions received from 250 organisations. The ideas were expanded upon during interactive sessions to allow participants and experts to refine the recommendations.

We are therefore pleased to present a summary of some of the recommendations under each key theme. The full and detailed recommendations, addressed in various ways and specifically to UNHCR, NGOs and Member States, will be published and disseminated in the final report.

Firstly, under the theme of upholding the Convention as a global public good. Protection against refoulement and access to territory and asylum were discussed as the core of the international protection regime. NGOs and UNHCR emphasised the need to strengthen coordinated monitoring and legal referral wherever such access is at risk. Participants insisted on closing the gap between access provided for by law and access in practice.

They called for greater safeguards for protection during returns, as well as independent verification that departures described as voluntary are in fact voluntary.

The right to seek asylum means nothing without effective access to asylum procedures and protection against refoulement, with identification and referral processes that are sensitive to protection needs along mixed migration and transit routes.

Statelessness can be prevented. All children must be registered and all people must be able to acquire a nationality, without discrimination either in law or in practice. During the debate, participants emphasised the importance of explicitly identifying — and addressing — the political causes of statelessness, rather than merely discussing it in technical terms.

Secondly, under the theme of protection through local action. Participants emphasised that forcibly displaced and stateless people, host communities and local actors must be involved in decision-making on protection. Participants made it clear that consultation is not the same as influence. Those affected and local actors must be able to see what has changed as a result of their participation. Local organisations must be key partners, not mere implementers. A refugee leader asked how refugee-led organisations can contribute to their communities if they are treated as volunteers rather than as partners. Participants responded by calling for shared leadership, fair remuneration and collaboration on protection-centred transition plans when UNHCR funding or presence diminishes.

Third, under the theme of countering anti-refugee narratives. Hate speech, xenophobia and false information about refugees, people seeking asylum, stateless people and humanitarian action are causing real-world harm, particularly through digital platforms. Participants outlined that refugees and stateless people must shape public communication as experts, authors and decision-makers. They called for strategies developed in partnership with refugees and for engagement with civil society, media and technology companies to address misinformation proactively and strengthen information integrity. Above all, we must never expose people to harm by making them visible. And refugee and stateless expertise must be compensated, not borrowed.

Fourth, under the theme of protection at the centre of durable solutions. Participants stressed that a solution is only durable if it is freely chosen. Every pathway, whether return, local integration or a third-country solution, must be grounded in safeguards, accurate information, independent legal counselling and informed consent. Voluntariness requires alternatives: if return is the only realistic option, there is no genuine choice. People must be able to raise concerns about pressure, coercion or exclusion and receive an appropriate response. For long-staying refugees and generations born in exile, local integration, secure status and pathways to nationality can prevent protracted displacement from becoming a pathway to statelessness. As one refugee participant put it, refugees do not want to die as refugees.

Dear Chair, Excellencies,

There were also many recommendations for NGOs, and their successful implementation, in part, depends on the Principles of Partnership between UNHCR and NGOs, being a lived reality. We thank UNHCR for sharing the results of its 2025 partnership survey with participants of the Consultations. The findings describe a partnership that is relationally strong, yet structurally strained. Nearly 95 per cent of respondents rated their partnership with UNHCR good or excellent. Yet half of local NGOs and community-based organisations reported carrying most of the operational risk.

UNHCR's revisions to its partnership framework, including lighter controls for smaller partnerships and fewer financial reports, move in the right direction. However, during the Consultations, NGOs asked for more commitment on co-creation from the outset, as UNHCR's own programme handbook sets out; explicit risk sharing; funding that reaches local partners with its flexibility intact; and greater participation and influence in decision making spaces.

The High Commissioner reminded the Consultations that civil society is part of who UNHCR is, not something acquired along the way. The Consultations are where that becomes practice: a trusted space in which international, local and refugee-led organisations can speak frankly, disagree and build solutions together with UNHCR. Sustaining that space requires investment in interpretation, accessibility, connectivity and participation. By supporting the Consultations and their co-designed recommendations, States can give practical effect to their commitments on localisation and the meaningful participation of organisations led by forcibly displaced and stateless people.

Participants welcomed the many reaffirmations of the Refugee Convention during its 75th anniversary year. But a Convention is measured by its practice, not its praise: whether a person arriving at a border is heard rather than turned away; whether a family remains together; whether a child goes to school; and whether a stateless person acquires a nationality.

The primary responsibility to protect rests with States. NGOs, and organisations led by refugees and stateless people, continue to accompany that responsibility with our expertise, our proximity and our principles.

This report concludes this year's Global Consultations, but the work is, really, yet to begin. The full and final recommendations of the Global Consultations will be published on UNHCR's and ICVA's websites. They will inform the High Commissioner's Dialogue on Protection and Solutions in December, and the road to the 2027 Global Refugee Forum. UNHCR and NGOs are developing a shared strategy to follow through on and monitor progress against these recommendations, including a joint review next year of what has been implemented, and what has not. "Accountability" was the word participants returned to again and again. We intend to honour it.

Excellencies, Chair, to conclude, these recommendations are co-created, and co-owned. Seventy-five years ago, States chose to make protection a shared obligation. The NGO community continues to strongly support that – with UNHCR, with this Committee, and in partnership.

We thank you.
